

iii) To achieve balance between a restrictive and a lenient metamodel, one would limit the required conditions to only the minimum required to have a properly functioning class. If a model is too restrictive, valid models will be rejected. For example, when modeling a human, defining hair color will result in the rejection of valid human instances. The same is true for not being specific enough and accepting invalid models.